Reading together provides a chance to interact and bond with your child.

When you point to and describe illustrations in the books you read together, you help develop your baby's language skills.

Babies hear a variety of words when you read to them. This helps them develop their vocabulary, especially when you read the same books over and over.

As your child gets older, they will learn how a book works: which way to hold it and which way to turn the pages.

Books help your child learn about different topics (animals, shapes, food, etc.).

Books help develop your child's imagination by introducing them to a whole world of new and exciting things, some real and some made up.

When you read your child stories, you help them tame their fears.

A wolf or a spider is much less scary when it's in a book! Your comforting presence during storytime will also make it easier for them to express their feelings.

Reading fosters an interest in writing. Without even realizing it, your child learns that written words can be read. As they get older, they'll learn that words are made up of the letters of the alphabet.

When you talk about the problems or emotions a character is experiencing and wonder aloud about solutions, you help your child develop reasoning and language comprehension skills.

When you read stories to your child, they gain a better understanding of the concepts of space and time (day, night, yesterday, tomorrow, here, there, etc.).

Children who are introduced to reading at an early age are likely to develop an interest in books, which will help them succeed once they're in school.
